

Do's And Don'ts When Training For Aggressive Dogs

Aggressive dogs start from being aggressive puppies. Dog owners usually mistake aggressive behavior with cute, playful behavior &ndash; until it is too late for them to realize their mistake and they desperately need to learn the right training for aggressive dogs, particularly the ones they own.

There are many modes of training: some are very effective, while some can worsen the aggression in dogs. Knowing what and what not to do in dog training for aggressive behavior can guarantee you a lifetime of friendship between you and your four-legged friend.

When training for aggressive dogs always remember to consult a professional first to assess your dog's behavior. Although the environment can be a huge factor in your dog's aggressive tendencies, there might also be a medical reason for these. An animal behavior specialist or a veterinarian can give you techniques for how to treat aggressive dog behaviors.

You already know that your dog is aggressive, so take it upon yourself, as a responsible owner to take proper precautions. While training for aggressive dogs that are very dangerous, refrain from taking them out in public unless guided by a professional.&nbsp; Keep your dogs away from situations in which they would feel more anxious and cause them to panic and attack.

One way of how to help an aggressive dog in letting go of his aggressions is to socialize him with other dogs and humans. It would be better for you to have your dog wear a muzzle when trying this technique, until your dog is feeling less anxious and appears relaxed.

Spay or neuter your dog. Training for aggressive behavior in spayed and neutered dogs will be easier than training intact dogs who are more likely to show different forms of aggressive behaviors.

Using punishment as an attempt on how to treat aggressive dog behavior is the worst thing you can do. Never punish your dog for showing aggression by hitting him or putting him in solitary confinement. This will just make the aggression worse since the dog will be more fearful, leading to more anxieties that could trigger a sudden attack.

Do not let your dog get used to aggressive and violent behaviors. If you do, you are working on how to help an aggressive dog become more dangerous - rather than obedient. Those tug-o-war games or any wrestling games where the dog has a chance to win over you can give them the impression of dominance.

Your dog must know how to act on command, and not just do everything to satisfy his own will. Never allow him to show dominance over you: don't allow him to walk before you or stay on the bed with you. Do not let him eat until you are finished, as well as never let him stay at a position that is above you.

Don't hold back praising your dog. Compliment your dog whenever he displays the right behavior. This is a great technique in training aggressive dogs &ndash; which typically love to please you. Eventually, your dog will be so happy with pleasing you that he will follow your commands by habit, as long as he feels that you are happy with it.

When training aggressive dogs seems to take you nowhere, always remember that successfully turning the little monster into a darling usually takes a long time and a lot of patience. This is not a one-time-big-time deal. Effort, coupled with love for your pet, usually reaps the most positive results.
