

Toy Talk: Sex Toys and Your Relationship.

In the past, people were often embarrassed by their sex toys keeping them well-hidden under the bed or high on a closet shelf. These days whether your sex life is vanilla or multi-flavored, couple directed or single user you probably already own one or more sex toys. People discuss sex toys publicly, make comparisons in friendly chat, and sometimes even display them as pieces of art and craft. A lovely glass dildo, for example, may be as proudly on 'show' as a fine vase or a piece of sculpture. Freely communicating about such intimate details can be a genuine boost to understanding and enjoying who and what you and your sex partners enjoy and are skilled at using. More and more people are coming to the understanding that sex toys can be effective and pleasurable accessories to their sex life, just as hot and trendy clothes, bling, and hi tech audio equipment are to their social lives. It's important, however, to maintain perspective and not become obsessive. Sex toys are accessories. They're the frosting, not the actual cake. While it's possible to become emotionally attached to your sex toys, it's far more rewarding and sexually healthy to simply use them as tools or sensual enhancements. Most people agree that shared physical intimacy between partners is still the best sex despite any promises of just like the real thing. Because of the variety of sexual preferences, SinlessTouch.com, offer a wide variety of sex toys, ranging from inanimate to fetish gear, vibrators, sensual enhancers, safe sex items, and other products designed for your pleasure. We are concerned about continuing education about the use and misuse of sex toys. We particularly emphasize good communication about how to introduce sex toys in a relationship. Obviously a first date or even a quickie hook-up may not be the ideal time to haul out your heavy duty equipment. Get to know your partner first before suddenly appearing in full dominatrix attire with spreader bars and your biggest strap-on dildo.
